Arab bid in Syria against Soviet moves

Kosygin to Baghdad, Damascus

By ANAN SAFADI
POST Middle East Affairs Correspondent

The Saudi Arabian and Kuwaiti foreign ministers flew into Damascus last night in what appeared to be a rush mission aimed mainly at warning Syria away from Soviet attempts to set up a radical Arab "rejection camp" including Iraq, Algeria, Libya and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The Iraqi news agency yesterday said that Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin will pay an "official and friendly" visit to Baghdad towards the end of this month. Earlier reports from Beirut said that the Soviet leader was also scheduled to visit Syria, but no official confirmation came from Damascus yesterday. Later, diplomatic sources in Damascus said Assad would visit the Syrian capital before the end of the month.

The Saudi Arabian and Kuwaiti ministers arrived in Damascus from Alexandria where they had a three-hour meeting with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, who has been accusing the Soviets with meddling in the Arab region with the aim of regaining the influence they lost in Egypt four years ago.

Saudi Arabia and Kuwait have set for themselves the immediate mission of reconciling Egypt and Syria, both of which have been at loggerheads ever since Sadat concluded the Sinai interim settlement with Israel last September.

The long-range task of the two oil-rich Arab countries however was seen aimed at countering the Soviet Union in Syria which now is entangled in the Lebanese crisis and must take a decision on whether to extend the mandate of the Golan Heights UN peacekeeping forces which expires next Sunday.

In contrast to the Soviet-backed hardliners in the Syrian Government, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait as well as Egypt believe that Damascus should renew the UN mandate to give the U.S. breathing space during the current presidential elections in order to formulate an overall settlement to the Middle East conflict.

Cairo radio last night said that UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim will arrive in Damascus tomorrow to discuss the question of the UN forces in the Golan. The radio said that Waldheim's visit would be followed by a UN Security Council debate on the subject over the week-end.

The Egyptian state radio quoted UN sources as saying that Waldheim's planned visit to the Syrian capital was received by Israel reluctantly. It added that Jerusalem feared the Secretary-General's visit to Damascus might encourage the Syrians to lay down certain conditions in return for the extension of UNDOF's mandate. Israel has already made it clear that it would reject any condition which Syria might attach to UNDOF's mission.

The Syrians had earlier said that the renewal of UNDOF's mandate would be subject to "political progress" in the Israel-Arab conflict, and indications were that Damascus planned to lay down such conditions. But whether Syria would be flexible appears to be largely dependent on the negotiations which Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, on the one hand, and the Soviet Union, on the other, are conducting with Damascus. Ba'athists back Assad's policy

Syria's ruling Ba'ath party yesterday issued a statement backing President Hafez Assad's policy on Lebanon. The statement was seen to be aimed at radical leftist press reports claiming that Assad was facing opposition in Syria as a result of his confrontation with Lebanon's radical camp, including the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The Ba'ath statement said that Syria was making "sincere efforts to stop the fighting in Lebanon in order to reach a comprehensive solution restoring order and stability in Lebanon and guaranteeing the unity of its people and its territorial integrity." It also affirmed the wish of the party and government in Syria to protect "the Palestinian revolution and not to harm its struggle."

Beirut battle of words over French troop offer

POST Middle East Affairs Correspondent

Fighting slackened in Lebanon yesterday as political leaders there were locked in a verbal war over France's controversial offer to send peace-keeping troops to Beirut.

Rashid Karami, the Muslim Prime Minister yesterday rejected the French offer, saying: "We do not want to go back to the old days of the French mandate." However, he supported what he called the "Syrian initiative" to settle the country's 14-month-old civil war.

Leftist leader Kamal Jumblatt reiterated his rejection of any "foreign" intervention by either France or Syria, adding that both countries try's 14-month-old civil war.

"It is amazing how Jumblatt considers the Syrian and French troops as foreigners without applying the same consideration to Palestinians," Christian Phalangist party chief Pierre Gemayyel said in a statement.

Salah Khalaf, second-in-command to Palestine Liberation Organization chief Yasser Arafat, yesterday

pledged to help the leftists take over Lebanon, while vowing to crush the Syrian-backed conservative forces. "The road to Palestine" runs across eastern and northern Lebanon, Khalaf said, hinting that the same road also runs through Syria. Khalaf's remark served as a reminder of old PLO statements that "the road to Palestine runs through Jordan."

Damascus radio, monitored in Nicola, said Lebanese president-elect Elias Sarkis had completed a three-point "comprehensive peace plan" to end the civil war. The plan calls for proclamation of an automatically renewable 48-hour truce by the warring sides while peace negotiations continue; renunciation by the warring factions of the use of military force for the settlement of political disputes; holding of a round-table conference to negotiate peace. Some traditionalist leaders may be excluded from the meetings, the radio said.

Mandate renewal seen

Jerusalem Post Military Correspondent

Syrian agreement to renewing the UNDOF mandate on the Golan is virtually being taken for granted in Israel. The view is that Syria's entanglement in Lebanon has tied Damascus hands and closed its option for letting the mandate lapse.

Waldheim's visit to Damascus will provide Syrian President Hafez Assad with the face-saving device he needs to justify the renewal, according to this assessment. The mandate expires on May 30 at midnight.

Syria's Lebanese adventure is seen as becoming more and more of a burden to Assad, both at home and internationally. Any move Syria makes to appease one of the Lebanese factions immediately antagonizes the others and observers see little prospect for Assad extricating himself intact.

Militarily, the Syrian presence in Lebanon is big enough to have a substantial impact on the course of events there. But Assad is believed to have missed his chance of resolving the civil war by the manner in which he sent his troops in — unit by unit, instead of achieving maximum psychological effect with one major move.

Now, to influence events, Assad will have to despatch at least a division and involve himself in heavy fighting, it is felt here. The Lebanese expedition has also created a very difficult situation for Assad at home, — with extremists criticizing him not only for diverting the army from its main aim fighting Israel, but also for having manoeuvred himself into backing the wrong side — the Christian Right instead of the Muslim Left, with whom the Syrian Ba'ath feels a close identification.

Experts here are even speculating about the possibility that the Lebanese adventure may be the beginning of the end for the present Ba'ath regime in Syria.

U.S. studies French plan for Lebanon with Israel, Arabs

BONN. — A senior American official disclosed yesterday that the United States is taking seriously a French plan to send peacekeeping troops to war-torn Lebanon.

The official, who briefed newsmen aboard Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's plane while enroute from Oslo to Bonn, said Washington had begun what he termed a "neutral" canvassing of Israel and Arab countries to gauge their reaction to the plan put forth by French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing while on a visit to the U.S.

The word "neutral" was used to underscore that the Ford Administration had not yet endorsed the French initiative. According to the official, U.S. approval depends on the details of the peacekeeping plan and, presumably, the reaction it receives in the Middle East.

During his nearly eight-hour stop-over in the West German capital, Kissinger met with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and other members of the Bonn government. (See story, page 4).

The senior official said that any U.S. agreement would have to follow approval by Lebanon's newly-elected president, discussion by Washington with the Israelis and other Middle East powers excluding Russia and some insurance a French troop arrival would not mean an influx of foreign forces, which America opposes.

And, said the official, France has yet to make the offer officially. The American discussions of the French offer were being held quietly and without fanfare, the official said.

In France itself, the opposition parties have warned the government against "gunboat diplomacy" and said "we know where a military adventure starts, we do not know where it ends." The Communist Party also indicated suspicion that Giscard's move was undertaken at "the request of the United States in order to serve its interests."

Giscard's drive in Paris, rallied, however, to Giscard's suggestion. Many Gaullists viewed his offer as "a sign of France's independence" and also as one of "responsibility for Lebanon's fate." (AP, UPI, JTA)

Giscard move a 'gimmick'

By DAVID LANDAU
Jerusalem Post Diplomatic Correspondent

Officials in Jerusalem do not seem to expect President Giscard d'Estaing's offer to send French troops into Lebanon to actually materialize — at least in the foreseeable future.

Giscard hinted the offer on the express approval of all parties in the Lebanese civil war, and the leftist forces have already rejected it.

The officials here are careful not to comment in any way on the French initiative. They acknowledge, though, that it is the subject of discussion between Jerusalem and Washington.

A highly knowledgeable observer meanwhile termed Giscard's proposal "a gimmick." The observer, closely familiar with French government and politics, added that Giscard almost certainly knew in advance that his proposal would not be accepted by all the parties in Lebanon — thus obviating the need for him to implement it.

"Had General de Gaulle still been alive, or even M. Pompidou, they would have probably acted months ago," the observer said. "And their action would probably have been both energetic and effective."

De Gaulle had felt a deep responsibility for Lebanon, the observer recalled, and would very likely not have allowed the civil war to go on there for over a year without his intervention.

"All the present French government has done," the observer pointed out, "is send in Couve de Murville for two weeks in November — seven months after the fighting began — on what was in effect a fruitless mission, though the Parisian press hailed it as a great success."

The second French embassy, George Gorse, had been similarly ineffective, the observer noted. Giscard's offer seemed to have come as a result of mounting discomfort among some sections of French public opinion at the worsening situation in the Lebanon and at France's patent inability to alleviate the situation. Banking on the offer being turned down, the President had apparently sought, according to the observer's reading, to appease this concern at home.

Honduras FM arrives here

BEN-GURION AIRPORT. — Israel can serve as an example to any nation fighting to live in peace within its borders, Honduras Foreign Minister Roberto Paredes Fareces said here last night on his arrival for a five-day visit.

Paredes and his wife were accompanied by Honduras' new non-resident ambassador to Israel, Jose de la Cruz Hernandez Rosa, and his wife.

Riots over T.A. demolition order

By ARTHUR KEMELMAN
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Tel Aviv. — One hundred and fifty policemen were called in to the Hatikva Quarter here last night to quell riots that broke out over a municipal order to demolish a small shoe factory on Rehov Netiv.

The demolition is to take place this morning.

Five policemen were injured during the riots and eight arrests were made. Some 500 residents of the neighbourhood are estimated to have participated in the disturbances.

The riots began at seven in the evening as Hatikva residents, incensed at the municipality's order, milled about at the junction of Rehov Etzel and Derech Lod. When a bus attempted to pass through the crowds it was stopped. The passengers escaped from the bus and angry youths dragged the driver from his seat.

The rioters then poured petrol over the bus tyres and set them alight. When firemen came to extinguish the fire, they were stoned. About 8 o'clock some 150 policemen and Border policemen moved into the area in order to quell the rioters. By 9.30 the rioting had ceased.

At the road crossing, however, burned tyres were still smouldering. Broken glass and stones littered the street, and groups of policemen and Border Police stood there, alert for trouble.

Agnew again strikes out at Israel policy

By WOLF BLITZER
Jerusalem Post Correspondent

WASHINGTON. — Former Vice-President Spiro Agnew has accused Israel of bringing about a "police state" in the administered territories and attacking the Arab civilian population there.

While conceding that Israeli authorities have "certainly" reacted to provocations, Agnew asked: "But what's the difference between what the Arab kids were doing in a Jordanian town and what our kids did in Chicago?" — a reference to the anti-Vietnam war demonstrations in Chicago at the time of the 1968 Democratic presidential nominating convention.

In an interview published yesterday in the "Washington Star," Agnew, who was forced to resign the Vice-presidency in 1973 after pleading no contest to bribery charges, also complained about the large-scale aid packages Israel has been receiving from the United States.

"I see no reason why nearly half of all the foreign aid this nation

Cabinet sets up c'ttee to speed integration of Israel's Arabs

By ASHER WALLFISH
Jerusalem Post Reporter

The Cabinet yesterday created new machinery to handle the affairs of the Arab sector, and speed the integration of Israel's Arab citizens in every possible sphere of national endeavour. It laid down no new policies, on the unanimous assumption of all the ministers that a sound policy already existed.

Nine Ministers advocated the new machinery for implementing policy, in three separate levels, while five ministers voted against the principal recommendation on the grounds that the present bodies were adequate. Two Ministers abstained.

In its principal recommendation, the Cabinet decided to set up a Committee of Ministers, chaired by the Prime Minister, to guide and coordinate the operations of the government Ministries and institutions, in line with Government policy.

The new committee will set up a public council comprising Jewish and Arab members, to advise and recommend in every sphere affecting the country's Arab citizens.

It will set up a committee of directors-general of ministries, chaired by the Premier's Adviser on Arab Affairs, to make sure that policy and decisions are coordinated.

These three operative decisions will enable speedier implementation of Government policy, the official Cabinet communiqué said, "in all matters related to integration of the Arabs in national life, on the basis of full and equal citizenship, with due regard for their specific religious and cultural character."

The Cabinet's discussion on handling the affairs of the Arab sector followed a presentation by Tourism Minister Moshe Kol of his 14-point plan on this topic, and the presentation of a memorandum by Shmuel Toledano, the Premier's Adviser on Arab Affairs. Toledano outlined the main problems related to the Arab community, and presented a memorandum which had been drafted by the permanent interdepartmental committee on the affairs of the community.

Prime Minister Rabin will name the composition of the Committee of Ministers at a future Cabinet session. Some of the Ministers will be appointed by virtue of their present functions. Others will be appointed to represent their parties. Rabin will also notify the Cabinet of the membership of the committee of the directors-general of ministries.

The first task of the Committee of Ministers will be to "study the Kol and Toledano proposals, and take decisions within the frame of approved Government policy," the Cabinet communiqué said.

The communiqué noted that the integration of Israel's Arabs into national life made it essential that the citizenry at large pull their weight. Social, economic and public organizations especially would have to respond to the challenge, the Cabinet said, adding that it would mobilize the public in general and its institutions in particular, to help put its policies into effect.

Five ministers, who said they saw no need for a permanent Committee of Ministers, felt it was quite enough to form an ad hoc body for the purpose of sifting the Kol and Toledano proposals. The five saw the proposed Committee of Ministers as a watchdog team making for more cumbersome functions, and coming between the Ministers directly involved, and their proper sphere of work. The five were Police Minister Shlomo Hillel, Interior Minister Yosef Burg, Religious Affairs Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Welfare Minister Ze'evulun Hammer and Transport Minister Gad Yarkoni.

Defence Minister Shimon Peres and Agriculture Minister Aharon Uzan abstained.

These seven, whose votes rendered the Government majority of nine far from clear-cut, have either intensive involvement with the Arab community, or have developed an expertise of one kind or another in Arab affairs. Their votes could be interpreted as a complaint that their colleagues were trying to meddle in their affairs, or give advice in spheres for which they had insufficient background.

Kol's 14-point plan kicked off with two of the proposals which the Cabinet adopted: to have a Committee of Ministers, and a public Arab-Jewish council. He also suggested a committee embracing all economic sectors to create 1,000 jobs for Arab university and high school graduates in the economy; a civil service committee to end jobs in Government employ for 250,000; a budget of IL2m for joint Arab-Jewish cultural and community activities which would be matched by like sums from the Histadrut and other sources; the promotion of more Arab-Jewish business and economic partnerships; the provision of compulsory national service projects for Arabs aged 18 to 21 years, and several more suggestions.

Kol told The Jerusalem Post that he first wanted to advocate action along these lines during Golda Meir's Premiership but was again granted Cabinet time. He again

Normal life returns to West Bank

Jerusalem Post Reporter

Quiet returned throughout the West Bank yesterday with several schools reporting a regular attendance. Business premises returned to normal on Saturday after several days of closure resulting from anti-Israeli rioting.

No incidents were reported yesterday except in Tulkarm where a demonstration was staged. This was dispersed by the security forces following clashes during which rioters hurled rocks at troops.

Earlier demonstration attempts by small groups in Nablus were immediately dealt with by the city fathers who undertook to maintain order in return for non-interference by the security authorities.

Our diplomatic correspondent said Defence Minister Shimon Peres last week criticized foreign news men stationed here for their coverage of the West Bank disturbances. He said some reports had been unbalanced and distorted, dwelling on the deaths caused by Israeli soldiers during the riots rather than on the riots themselves which had often endangered soldiers' lives.

Peres made his remarks at a briefing for members of the Foreign Press Association in Tel Aviv. They were reported by government sources yesterday.

CABINET HEARS MEIR'S REPORT

Jerusalem Post Diplomatic Correspondent

President Ford told Mrs. Golda Meir last week that U.S.-Israel understanding had "improved significantly" since Premier Rabin's visit to Washington in January. Rabin reported to the Cabinet yesterday on Ford's remarks, as relayed to him by Mrs. Meir.

The former Premier is currently in Washington where she was feted by the AFL-CIO at a dinner last Thursday.

Ford told Mrs. Meir that he had worked out a "common political approach" with her successor, Rabin. If no political progress had been made since Rabin's visit, Ford said, it was not Israel's fault. He praised Israel's "flexibility," and particularly its readiness to try end-of-war negotiations with the Arab states.

The U.S. President has also pledged, according to Rabin, that "Washington would not countenance Syrian demands for extraneous political concessions to be hinged to the UNDOF mandate renewal."

Tremor in Peru

LIMA. — A moderate earthquake shook much of central Peru's coastal mountains yesterday. Geophysical Institute officials said it measured 4.5 on the open-ended Richter scale.

There were no immediate reports of injuries or damage in Lima.

Kfir offered to Austria

Jerusalem Post Diplomatic Correspondent

Defence Minister Shimon Peres confirmed yesterday that Israel had offered to sell its Kfir fighter-plane to Austria. He told the Cabinet that a Austrian delegation was expected here shortly to discuss the deal.

The Kfir, he said, would also be exhibited at the Farnborough Airshow in Britain later this summer.

Other points made by the Defence Minister:

The West Bank had quietened down over the weekend, following "appropriate steps" by the authorities. (This apparently referred to the introduction of more Jordanian Police, the imposition of immediate curfews on sign of trouble, and efforts to reduce troop presence whenever possible in heavily populated areas.)

Of the six people killed in riots on the West Bank since last November, four had been shot by troops facing actual danger to their own lives, and one — the 17-year-old Nablus girl — had been hit by accident. The sixth case, that of a man in Safit who died after apparently being beaten by troops, had been thoroughly investigated, and as a result an officer would be court-martialed.

The overall situation on the southern front was as had been anticipated when the interim agreement with Egypt was signed last September. Both sides were observing the agreement, though on occasion there were allegations of breaches, and these were examined by the UNDOF. Currently there was a dispute over the size and number of Egyptian units permitted in the Sinai under the agreement, and this was being examined by the UNDOF. There was "no need for further action on this matter."

The planned National Defence College would open early next year. It would be housed in the Command and Staff College and its aim would be to give officers a university-level education in defence-related subjects, including aspects of political science, economics, sociology and technology. Most of the teaching staff would be drawn from Tel Aviv University, but there would also be lecturers from the country's other universities.

Mapam disagrees on policy with Labour

By JOSHUA BRILLIANT
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Mapam leaders yesterday disagreed on how to reach a common peace and security policy with the Labour Party.

There was considerable opposition to a proposal that Mapam make reparations to run independently in the coming elections while leaving the final decision until after the Labour Party's convention in December.

Mapam's political committee had been expected to vote on this proposal yesterday but members claimed they were being rushed. The committee's decision, expected Wednesday, will serve as a recommendation to the party's convention beginning June 9.

Reporting on more than 20 hours of "clarification talks" with the Prime Minister and senior Labour ministers, Mapam secretary-general Eliezer Tal told the political committee that "I can't say that the replies we received were satisfactory." Mapam leaders, for example, opposed the Alon plan and establishment of Jewish settlements in the West Bank. They also favoured negotiations with the PLO under certain conditions. Their policies were opposed by many — and on some issues by all — Labour leaders.

But Knesset Member Eliezer Ronen said that "some Labour Party members are closer to me than to some of their colleagues in the party." Yehoshua Hassan, who favours continuation of the Alignment, said that it would be disastrous to conceal the fact Mapam members were surprised at the do-minish policies some Labour leaders advocated.

The Labour Party refused to commit itself to any new formulas, arguing it could not do so before its convention.

Some Mapam leaders accepted this argument. Hassan, for example, said he believed the Labour leaders would carry their views to their party's convention.

But MKs Yehuda Yudin and Ronen were more sceptical. They said that the Labour leaders would try to work out a consensus among the different factions in their own party. The outcome, therefore, would be more hawkey than expected at the meetings with the Mapam leaders, they argued.

In advocating arrangements to run independently, Mapam leaders apparently hoped to increase pressure on the Labour Party. They said they expected a shift to the right in Labour which would try to attract potential Likud supporters in the coming election campaign. To check that trend, it wanted to strengthen the hand of the Labour doves, or even attract them to its ranks if Labour becomes too hawkish.

Mapam sources also reckoned there would be more credible if measures to do so were under way. But they also said they would not have enough time to prepare for the elections if they waited until after the Labour Party's convention. The Knesset elections are due in October 1977, about ten months after the Labour Party convention.

Khaled to Iran today

TEHRAN. — King Khaled of Saudi Arabia arrives here today for a four-day visit, which reflects the growing entente between the two most powerful countries in the strategic Persian Gulf region.

One main topic of discussion with his host, the Shah, will be the issue of peace and security of the oil, which has about 49 per cent of the world's total proven oil reserves. They will also discuss the Arab-Israeli conflict and international political and economic questions.

The Shah, whose forces have helped to subdue Marxist rebels in the Dhofar province of the Oman Sultanate, will also be interested to hear from King Khaled more about Saudi Arabia's surprise policy change towards the leftist People's Democratic Republic of (South) Yemen.

Iran does not recognise South Yemen, which is the Dhofari rebels' main base for training and supplies.

Conservative Saudi Arabia too did not recognise South Yemen, which it regarded as Marxist, until last March, although the former British territory achieved independence in 1967. The Saudi diplomatic move is said to be aimed at pushing the Soviet Union out of the territory by giving the South Yemen Government all assistance.

About 8,000 Cubans are reported to be in South Yemen to train the Aden army and Dhofari rebels, and this, observers say, does not make the Iranians feel overly optimistic about the Saudi diplomatic success there.

But on the whole, the King's visit here is regarded by the observers as part of the high-level exchanges being organised since the two countries have come to recognise each other's political, military and economic power, and have chosen to work jointly to ensure peace in the Gulf.

Arab council heads want expropriation cancelled

By YOEL DAR
Jerusalem Post Reporter

HAIFA. — The nine-member Committee of Arab Local Council Heads, which will be received by Premier Yitzhak Rabin at its request this morning, will present him with a list of demands. It was learned yesterday. These include the cancellation of the lands expropriation plan and the transfer of all Government-owned lands within the jurisdictional areas of the Arab local councils to the council's ownership.

The committee also wants all Government-owned lands worked by Arab farmers for 15 consecutive years to be made over to the farmers' ownership. They also want the Moslem religious trust assets to be transferred to a Moslem commission elected by the council heads.

On another level, the committee demands the abolition of all Arab affairs departments in Government offices, because these are a "symbol of discrimination."

They will also call on the Premier to appoint a board of inquiry into the March 30 "Land Day" disturbances, the cancellation of legal action against Arabs arising out of the disturbances and the reinstatement in their jobs of all Arab workers who were dismissed for talking part in the strike.

Asher Wallfish adds:
Premier Rabin is likely to generate disappointment as well as tension among the mayors today. He will tell the delegation that while he is prepared to hear their grievances, the dialogue will have to be restricted to municipal affairs. As Interior Minister Yosef Burg prompted Rabin at yesterday's Cabinet session, the Premier will remind the mayors, before the meeting gets under way, that regular channels exist whereby all non-municipal issues can be raised.

Rabin wants to make it clear to the mayors that he will not regard their organization as a sort of mini-parliament for an Arab canton in Israel, but will treat them as precisely what they are: local council heads with problems of a municipal nature who have decided to air their municipal problems in common instead of separately.

Burg told Rabin that he understood the mayors planned to give a press conference after their meeting with the Premier, to reflect their side of the meeting. Burg said Rabin should consider asking the mayors to drop this plan. If they insisted, Burg said, it might be wise to stage another press conference to present the official side.

Mystery shell found in J'lem

Jerusalem police yesterday morning found an unexploded Katyusha shell whose whereabouts had puzzled them since late Friday night.

The rocket was heard about 1 a.m. by residents of the Armon Hamatziv Quarter as it went over their homes, but no explosion followed the characteristic whistle.

However, yesterday, a shopkeeper in downtown Rehov Bezalel reported the missing rocket—in his basement.

The police are continuing to investigate the origin of the blast.

VAT may be retroactive for banks and insurers

By GIDION ESHET
Jerusalem Post Economic Reporter

The Knesset Finance Committee will vote today on a Treasury proposal to impose Value Added Tax on financial institutions retroactive from January 1. Implementation of the overall VAT has been delayed until July 1.

In a letter to the committee's chairman, the Finance Minister explained that the service tax on financial institutions such as banks and insurance companies—which, like VAT, is imposed on their wage bill and profits—expired at the end of December. For that reason he would make VAT retroactive as far as these institutions is concerned.

The vote will be taken today after MKs question the legality of the proposed retroactive tax.

In yesterday's meeting committee chairman Yisrael Karmann suggested that self-employed persons who by July 1 do not use a cash register for VAT purposes should be deprived of their licence. The committee rejected a proposal by Yeheskel Flumin to approve the suggested law only after the Government cuts IL2,500m. from the budget.

Meanwhile, the Ministerial Economic Committee yesterday approved the Rona Committee recommendations, which are meant to guarantee the value of foreign investments in Israel against the creeping devaluations.

Accordingly, in firms where there is at least 25 per cent foreign ownership, a special fund may be created which will be linked to the rate of exchange and which will be tax deductible. In addition, foreign investors will be permitted to depreciate their investment faster than other investors.

The Treasury will prepare a bill which will be tabled in the Knesset in accordance with the Rona recommendations.

Shmueli heads Education Min. for one year

Jerusalem Post Reporter

The Cabinet, at its weekly session yesterday, confirmed the appointment of Eliezer Shmueli as acting director-general of the Education Ministry.

Shmueli, the present deputy director-general, will hold his new appointment from July 1, 1976, until August 31, 1977, while the present director-general, Elad Peled, is on study leave.

Born in Larissa, Greece, in 1928, Shmueli was brought to this country at the age of seven. After army service he attended teacher training college in Jerusalem, later earning a B.A. in education from the Hebrew University and an M.A. in educational guidance and administration from Columbia University.

Rising quickly through the educational administration system, Shmueli was in turn elementary school teacher, principal, teachers' seminar lecturer, assistant to the Education Minister, supervisor of elementary schools, and, since 1972, deputy director-general. Shmueli has been chiefly associated with implementing the "reform" plan for establishing junior high schools. He has also been the chief link between the ministry and the UJA's Israel Education Fund, which since its establishment 11 years ago has channelled over $47m. into the building of kindergartens and comprehensive schools here.

Rabin gives Hammer extra responsibility

Jerusalem Post Reporter

Welfare Minister Zevulun Hammer will serve as acting Interior Minister commencing this week, when Yosef Burg goes abroad on a fund-raising mission. Premier Yitzhak Rabin told the Cabinet at its weekly session yesterday.

The fact that Hammer got the job, and not Religious Affairs Minister Yitzhak Rabin, is seen in some political quarters as meaning that Premier Yitzhak Rabin does not recognize any special hierarchy within the National Religious Party, to which all three — Burg, Hammer and Raphael — belong.

It is also seen as a ploy by Rabin to win Hammer over in advance of the Cabinet's impending discussion on the Kaddum resettlement crisis, due in two or three weeks. Hammer is close to the Gush Emunim group, which sponsors the Kaddum project, and has been conferring with Gush Emunim leaders regularly since the Cabinet decided earlier this month that Kaddum would have to be shifted.

J'lem satisfied by poor Arab showing at WHO

By DAVID LANDAU
Jerusalem Post Diplomatic Correspondent

There was quiet satisfaction in Jerusalem over the weekend at the Arabs' poor showing at the World Health Organization assembly in Geneva. While the ritual anti-Israel motions were passed there, they won only Arab Communist and Third World support. All the Western nations and a large number of Third World states refused to support the assembly's rejection of WHO's own medical team's report on the administered areas.

The Arabs and their allies insisted that the report — which found improvement in the medical services of the areas since 1967 — be rejected because the three committee members were only allowed into Israel as individuals, not as a team. Western and many neutral diplomats spurned this reasoning as plainly specious, and the general feeling was that the Arabs had overreached this time.

Officials here are hoping that the rift in Third World pro-Arab solidarity opened up at Geneva can be maintained and even widened at subsequent international parleys.

It is now learned that the separate visits of the three WHO committee members were arranged and carried out with the active approval of the WHO itself. The WHO director-general, in fact, sent the deputy legal adviser of the Organization to accompany each of the three committee members on his inspection of the administered areas.

Student protest cancelled

By ERNIE MEYER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

A demonstration at the Hebrew University scheduled for 9 a.m. today by the Campus organization, which groups leftist and Arab students, was called off yesterday by the organizers.

The reason for the cancellation seems to be the university's announcement that it would no longer issue permits for political demonstrations and that it would call the police in to disperse unauthorized rallies. The proximity of Student Union elections this Wednesday may also have been a factor in cancelling the demonstration.

Arab and Jewish students clashed last Wednesday, as Arab students protested methods used to suppress the recent West Bank riots.

Elections for officers of the Student Union, although nominally on a personal basis, in fact, run according to party lines. The main contenders this year are the Campus group; Castel, which combines Likud supporters and the Yavne religious student group; and Ma'as, the Labour Party group. Last year, Campus and Castel each polled about 30 per cent of the votes, and Yavne (which ran separately), about 15 per cent. Ma'as did not participate in the last election.

Poultry breeders squawk about low consumption

By YITZHAK OKED
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Despite reports that the level of consumption of Israelis has not gone down, the poultry breeders claim there has been a drop in the consumption of chicken, turkey and eggs. There are now large surpluses of these products.

Mickey Yadin, co-chairman of the Poultry Breeders Association, told a press conference that as of yesterday the hatcheries of egg-laying chickens were being closed down for a full month. According to Yadin this step will bring a drop of about 40 million eggs in the market by next January or February. He promised that with the large surpluses available now there will not be a shortage of eggs later.

Amos Hadar, MK, who is also a co-chairman of the association, put part of the blame to the present situation on Ireland for "dumping" beef on Israel at below production-cost prices.

Allenby Bridge closed tomorrow

The Allenby Bridge across the Jordan River will be closed tomorrow, all day, at the request of Jordan. The Jordanian command announced yesterday. It will reopen the following morning. The Adam (Damya) Bridge will remain open.

Israel Radio said the reason for the Jordanian request was that tomorrow is Jordan's Independence and Army Day.

Kupat Holim budget: IL 2,361m.

By MACABEE DEAN, Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Kupat Holim yesterday approved its 1976/77 budget of IL2,361m., about IL700m. higher than the 1975/76 budget. The current budget has a deficit of IL200m.

Asher Yadin, director-general of the sick fund, noted that the increase was due to three main factors — higher hospitalization costs (due mainly to the Government cutback in financing this item), devaluations, which resulted in higher costs for imported drugs and other items; and the general rise in costs.

The fund, which meets the medical needs of 2,516,000 persons, with a staff of 19,000 derives most of its income from Mas Makhbi (or players' contributions), which brings in IL950m. Members fees tot IL500m.

No room at Beersheba hostel

BEERSHEBA. — Immigrants from South America who had planned to settle in Beersheba have been sent to other towns because there is no room at the absorption centre here, Mayor Eliahu Navi complained yesterday.

The mayor said the lack of space threatened to wreck a lot Beersheba-Jewish Agency effort under which a special emissary has been sent to South America to bring 500 immigrant families. The Negov city already has a strong community of former South Americans.

Pupils away in school dispute

Jerusalem Post Reporter

RAMAT HASHARON. — No pupils showed up at Oranim School here for the second day yesterday, as parents determined not to allow their children to return to classes until the local council drops its plan to close the school.

Oranim, which has some 400 pupils in grades one through eight is an integrated school serving the lower-income population of the Morasha neighbourhood and the wealthier section of Neve Miga.

Seven years for manslaughter

HAIFA. — Albert Dahan, 21, of Haifa was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment by the Haifa District Court yesterday. The victim, Maimon (Motti) Levy, 21, was four beaten to death last January 8, in the back of a Haifa billiard parlor. Originally accused of first-degree murder, Dahan pleaded guilty to the lesser charge of manslaughter.

Another man who had been accused of complicity in the murder David Cohen, was acquitted last week.

Court to hear MK's libel suit

TEL AVIV. — District Court judges yesterday ruled that MK Akhi Nof's charges against a reporter and editor of the weekly "Ha'ol Hazeh" constitute libel and should be reviewed by the Magistrate Court.

The lower court had thrown the case out when a magistrate accepted the claim of reporter Yossi Yanai and editor Uri Avneri that the charge sheet was unclear; but Nof appealed the decision, and Nof claims he was libelled in a piece called "Knessetour," in which Yanai alleged that Knesset members frequently take pleasure jam abroad at the Government's expense.

New investment law approved

Jerusalem Post Economic Reporter

The Cabinet yesterday approved a new law to encourage capital investment which increases grants and loans for investment in developing towns and for export industries.

Under the bill, to be tabled in the Knesset next week, a special bonus will be given to exporters in line with their export performance. At the same time, aid will be cut to those who invest in the central part of the country. Development loans have been half-linked to the Consumer Price Index, with a ceiling of 12-17 per cent (including interest).

Arab, Druse villages to vote

Municipal elections will be held tomorrow in seven Arab and Druse villages.

In Beit Jann, Jula, Kafr Kari, Makr, Nahr and Sakhin, the municipal councils are elected every four years. However, this will be the first such election ever held in Deir el-Assad.

Separate votes will be cast for the local council and for the chairman of the council, in line with the new law on direct election of mayors.

Cabinet c'tee on Arabs

raised the demand for a Cabinet debate with Premier Rabin 12 months ago. He presented his 14-point plan to the Cabinet Secretary six weeks ago.

The Committee of Ministers would enable the Prime Minister's Arab Adviser to cease working in a vacuum, and give him the most authoritative forum possible to back up his operations, Kol said. As for coordination, which was often badly lacking in governmental operations in the Arab community, he said, the committee of directors-general could cut through red tape much faster than the existing interdepartmental committee, whose senior officials always had to refer back to their directors-general.

The public council would enable a broad-based dialogue between representative Jews and Arabs. It would provide a far more accurate sounding-board of trends and needs in the Arab community than the existing contact between the authorities and those who were their proteges, Kol said.

He said that none of the Ministers objected to his call for national service in the Arab community, in fields like health, education, welfare and development projects. Such service was essential to give the Arabs a feeling of national involvement and responsible obligation, he believed.

Tolidano's proposals are said to be similar to those of Kol. Tolidano was said to have been pleased with the Cabinet's decisions, and predicted that the Committee of Ministers would approve the bulk of his own memorandum once it commenced its deliberations.

According to several reports, Tolidano may give up his job as Adviser on Arab Affairs in the next few months to take up a diplomatic post and be replaced by a former I. officer.

In the Cabinet debate, Religious Affairs Minister Yitzhak Rabin rejected to creating a permanent Committee of Ministers, because it amounted to an admission of 28 years of failure on the Government's part. Raphael said Israel's Arabs made tremendous strides since 1948 and had reached a record in the Arab world for natural increase and expectancy. Economically, he said, the average Arab here was better off than many Jews.

He said the problem which undoubtedly existed was more of political, social and spiritual question, than a material question. In the spiritual sphere, among others, authorities had tried to force Arab citizens into a Jewish mould, he failed to cultivate a class of authoritative religious leaders, and he offended the Moslems' religious susceptibilities in several cases. On such case, Raphael noted, was a plan to transform the Hassan B. mosque in Jaffa into a commercial and entertainment complex.

Raphael was not sure that practical plans for an Arab national service scheme would be evolved which would be acceptable to the Arabs.

Police Minister Shlomo Hillel reportedly voted against the Committee of Ministers' proposal because it existing channels were the most effective and the most direct. He told The Post last night that national service for Arabs was a sound idea, in principle, since it made for equal treatment between Jews and Arabs. However, the question would be to work out suitable types of service.

Welfare Minister Zevulun Hammer said a special Committee of Ministers would "perpetuate the Arab problem as an issue apart."

Truck bypass ordered for dangerous Tiberias road

By DAVID SLAY
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TIBERIAS. — The Public Works Department has been allocated a sum of money in its 1976/77 budget for the urgent building of a detour route, on the western outskirts of the town, to get heavy trucks off the dangerously sloping and tortuous highway now leading into the city. The road was the scene of a major accident last week, when a passenger-carrying truck overturned, killing 18 persons and injuring dozens of others.

The PWD director in Galilee, Farahmeh Rapp, told The Jerusalem Post yesterday that the construction which is to begin next winter has been given top priority and could be completed within two years if the funds are kept flowing. The 15-kilometre detour would start at the Golani Junction, pass through Migdal, bypassing Tiberias and joining the Rosh Pina highway 8 km. beyond the town. It would be earmarked for trucks of over eight tons, which have been the main victims of the present road. Half a year ago, a small lane was constructed just before the dangerous turning, where heavy trucks were obliged to draw in to cool their brakes and have them examined before negotiating the road. A traffic sign was put up and a constable was assigned to check brakes, but no mechanical checking equipment was available. As most drivers honoured the sign, the police withdrew the permanent constable after two months, relying on spot checks and issuing warnings and tickets against drivers not complying with the brake-cooling obligation. Now, the police propose to make a parking lot near Portiya Hospital where trucks would be able to cool their brakes before reaching the downhill stretch.

RECIPIENT OF 1975 ROTHSCILD PRIZE:

Israel is major centre of Islamic studies

By AARON SEITNER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Israel is fast becoming a major centre of Islamic and Arab studies, a leading scholar in this field claimed last night.

Speaking at the Knesset on behalf of the four winners of the 1975 Rothschild Prize, Prof. David Ayalon said: "It is no coincidence that two out of the four awards this year are going to persons involved in studying the culture and universal values of the Moslems and Arabs."

"Islamic and Arabistic studies have surged ahead in importance here, especially at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. There is great interest among students in the contribution of Moslems and Arabs to civilization. More and more courses are being added to cover the many subjects involved in such studies."

Prof. Ayalon, an expert in the Mameluke period, said Israeli studies in Islamic and Arab fields are widely circulated in Arab countries by scholars there — "though, regrettably, they frequently neglect to note the origin."

Prof. Gershon Scholem, chairman of the Israel Committee for the Rothschild Prize, announced that last night's awards were the last in an annual cycle that had lasted for 18 years. A new format of the honour will be decided upon by the Yad Hanadiv foundation by the end of this year.

Deputy Prime Minister Yigal Alon represented the Government at last night's ceremonies. Other guests of honour — besides Dorothy Rothschild, Lord Rothschild and British Ambassador Anthony Elliott — were Knesset Speaker Yisrael Yeshayahu, Ministers Gideon Hausner and Aharon Yadin, and Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek.

Speaking at last night's award presentation ceremonies, Lord Rothschild disclosed that next October has been set as target date for opening of Everyman's University. The "university" will have no campus but will offer courses leading to a bachelor's degree by mail, television and radio programmes and tape cassettes.

"Everyman's University will not be just another university," Lord Rothschild declared. "It will not undertake tasks already handled by Israel's universities. It will attempt to fill the gaps in post-secondary education, whether the gaps involve academic upgrading of teachers, vocational training, second-chance courses or adult education."

"Only one question remains: will the people of Israel avail themselves of the opportunity which will shortly be offered to them in a variety of degree and non-degree courses ranging from mathematics and life sciences to electronics, earth sciences and Jewish studies?"

Headquarters of Everyman's University will be in Ramat Aviv, near the offices of Educational Television — another Yad Hanadiv project whose establishment in 1963 was followed by the opening of Rothschild Foundation's Centre for Educational Technology a few years later.

Lord Rothschild predicted that the progress of Everyman's University would be "watched with interest in many parts of the world."

The four winners of the 1975 Rothschild Prize, worth £30,000 each, are:

• Professor Joshua Jortner, 43, of Tel Aviv University, who has by Maimonides, made major contributions to the field of order-disorder in solids and impurity states — both theoretical and experimental. Held by many in this country to be one of Israel's leading physical chemists, Prof. Jortner's work has also covered spectroscopy, chemical and other properties of solvated electrons in liquids.

• Professor David Ayalon, 62, of the Hebrew University. Acknowledged as one of the world's leading authorities on medieval Arab history, Prof. Ayalon has published a considerable body of work on the Mameluke period in Egypt and Syria. His research is marked by meticulous attention to detail, excellent critical sense and clarity. His works are even cited in Arab countries.

• Professor Haim Harari, 36, of the Weizmann Institute. An eminent physicist, Prof. Harari's many contributions to contemporary high-energy physics theory include the introduction of duality diagrams which enabled the successful exploitation of duality in particle physics. His pioneering paper "Theoretical Implications of the New Particles" is considered the standard work on the present state of scientists' knowledge of particle theory.

• Professor Shlomo Pines, 68, of the Hebrew University, for his outstanding contributions to the fields of Arabic and Judeo-Arabic philosophy. For 40 years Prof. Pines has provided scholars with a steady flow of studies in these fields. The greatest, perhaps, is his masterly translation of, and introduction to, Maimonides' "Guide for the Perplexed," in which he gives the sources used

'Oil strike' unconfirmed

By JOSEPH MORGENSTERN
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Reports in yesterday's afternoon papers that samples of oil, mixed with salt water and mud, had been brought up from the Ashdod II drill hole ignited a spate of buying in oil shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (see stock report on page 7).

But oil sources refused to confirm the strike and said that drilling was actually running into technical difficulties.

Itm reported on Saturday that Lapidot workers at the drilling site had been seen replacing the pipes in the drill hole with smaller-bore pipes resembling those used in producing wells.

But Menahem Chen, managing director of the Israel Institute of Petroleum and Energy, stated categorically yesterday that it is not yet possible to draw any conclusions as to the commercial prospects for the Ashdod test well. In fact, he said, the work is being hindered by technical difficulties and, at least for the time being reports of an oil strike should not be taken seriously.

Apart from meetings at the Norwegian Parliament, Yeshayahu will call on Premier Odvar Nordli, Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund, and the mayor of Oslo.

Other events will include a lunch by the Knesset Speaker for his Norwegian counterpart, a reception for the Knesset Speaker by Israel Ambassador David Rivlin, and a meeting with the Jewish community.

Farmers urge quick start for air cargo company

By YITZHAK OKED
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Farmers' organizations are stepping up their campaign to have the new air cargo charter company being organized by Ahuf (Res.) Mordechai Hod operate as soon as possible.

Mickey Yadin of the Poultry Breeders Union told a press conference here yesterday that every day the company's operation is postponed, his association loses both money and new "export-dollar" markets. He said that by chartering a Boeing 707, poultry readers could ship to Iran about 60,000 chicks for 13 to 14 cents each. On regular flights they can end only small numbers, for about five cents per chick.

Yadin claims that Motti Hod has proposed to fly the chicks at a maximum cost of six cents. He would fly them in Boeing 747 cargo planes, which will enable the association to export 600,000 chicks at a time.

The Histadrut Agriculture Centre, which protested "foot-dragging" in forming the new company, "Every day new difficulties arise, which set the farmers back in their efforts to export more," Zvi Magen, the centre's spokesman said yesterday.

He added that the Agriculture Centre has decided to establish a point Mordechai Ben-Ari, president of El Al, as chairman of the board of the new air cargo company. The Agriculture Centre believes that El Al should continue developing its own cargo department. Its partnership in this new company poses a conflict of interest, Magen said.

El Al spokesman Mordechai Savitsky said El Al will hold 49 per cent of the new company. Another 49 per cent will go to Agrexco, the agricultural export company, to other agricultural bodies and to Mordechai Hod. The remaining 2 per cent will be shared by the Ministries of Transport and Finance.

Savitsky said Yerahmiah Shrem, a senior El Al official, will head the committee to establish the new company, and former El Al spokesman Arnold Sherman will join the committee to work mainly with public relations.

Yankee Doodle Dandy extravaganza on July 4

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Reporter

U.S. citizens in Israel who can't afford the ticket and travel tax, but still want fireworks, a veterans' parade, cotton candy and an old-fashioned barbershop quartet on America's bicentennial can enjoy them in Jerusalem this July 4th.

A "Yankee Doodle Dandy" extravaganza in honour of 200 years of U.S. independence is being organized by a public committee headed by Arthur Hoffman, a retired U.S. Air Force colonel and now an Israeli citizen.

Hoffman said the aim was to promote better U.S.-Israel relations, as well as provide some fun. Hoffman, who is financing the fête from his own pocket — and from selling 5,000 tickets at IL20 each — said he proceeds will go to a scholarship fund for needy American immigrant children.

The 13-hour "Woodstock" festival begins on Sunday, July 4th at 2 p.m., with a parade of U.S. veterans, U.S. Marine colour guard and the Israeli National Police Band into the Hebrew University stadium. The live entertainment will include folk-singers, banjo players, a blue grass group and political musings. Ticket-holders (only U.S. citizens and their guests) will then compete in a golf contest, bicycle race, kite contest, soap box derby and basketball freethrow contest judged by American-Israeli sports stars.

To test the political wind, the organizers will conduct a "straw election poll" among the celebrants, asking them for their choices for the Democratic and Republican nominations and finally, for the presidency.

An hour of fireworks for the ticket-holders (as well as a free performance for the tens of thousands expected to have picnics on the hillside surrounding the stadium), will be followed by the screening of movies until 1 a.m.

The Government has no connection with Hoffman's July 4th celebrations, but the Information Centre is organizing some more placid events of its own. They include a symposium on American Jewry, special lessons in school on the U.S., a Hebrew University exhibition on American history and culture, and a concert in Beit Hanassi of works by native American composers.

Agnew again raps Israel

merica, especially in the Congress and the media, for this development.

American Jewish leaders have acted sharply against what is seen as Agnew's crude anti-Semitism. But yesterday Agnew denied that he was anti-Semitic.

"That's been an accusation that's ade, but the transparent fault with at thesis is when I was in office, when it wasn't obviously to my advantage to say these things and certainly there was no business association with the Arabs, I still took is point of view," he replied. "When did my Middle East trip, I did because I felt the policy was so even."

"I went to Kuwait and I went to udi Arabia and I did not go to rael. All the Congress, everybody as running to Israel, and I didn't el that was right, I still have a of Jewish friends, the same ount I've always had."

Agnew said that the trouble with e American Jewish community is at it is "too sensitive."

Regarding the media, Agnew ain charged yesterday that the umber of Jews in important positions, both ownership and manager- i, was totally out of proportion to e number of Jews in the popula- on. He suggested that 50 per cent of the important positions were id by Jews.

Asked to specify his charge, gnew claimed that the three ma-

For example," he continued, "CBS, Mr. (William) Paley's Jewish. And that is not said in a defama- tory way. Mr. Julian Goodson, who runs NBC; there's a Mr. Leonard Goldenson at ABC. Mrs. (Katherine) Graham of the "Washington Post" Mr. Sulzberger of "The New York Times," you go down the line in that fashion, not just with own- ership, but go down the managing posts and the discretionary posts, you'll find that through their brightness and their aggressiveness and their inventiveness — these are terms I'm lauding them for — they have worked their way up."

"Not only in the media, but in academic communities, the financial communities, in the foundations, in all sorts of highly visible and influential services that involve the public... now the reason I brought this out was I said how can these people be totally objective where Israel is concerned? I'm not talking about Israel as a religious entity. I'm talking about it as a nation with which we have to deal in the sense of the regional problems that are happening there."

'Soviet move won't block Chess Olympiad in Haifa'

By YA'ACOV FRIEDLER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

HAIFA. — The Chess Olympiad and congress of the International Chess Federation (FIDE) will take place in Haifa as scheduled in October, despite the Soviet Union's announcement that it would not take part. Yisrael Eshel, chairman of the organizing committee, announced yesterday. He expressed the committee's surprise and regret at the Russian decision and the hope that it was not final.

Leading players taking part in the national chess championship at the Nof Hotel speculated that the Russian move may be an attempt to drum up support for their drive to change the world championship rules before their reigning champion, Anatoli Karpov, defends his title within two years.

Eshel noted that there were no organizational reasons for the withdrawal, and the committee was expecting an official reaction from FIDE. Eshel said it was estimated that if the Russians did not change the decision, perhaps six Eastern Bloc countries might refrain from sending their teams, out of the nearly 70 countries which intend to participate.

Senior Master Yitzhak Radaash-kovich, who immigrated from the Soviet Union three years ago, thought that the Russian gambit was aimed at getting the consent of Israel and other countries to support their proposals at the congress, which will be held simultaneously with the Olympiad.

Grand Master Moshe Cherniak noted that the Soviets had joined FIDE only in 1962, and that earlier Olympiads had been played without them. He said the 1976 games could also "certainly be played without them," though their absence would lower the standard.

At the congress, the Russians reportedly want to change the championship rules in line with the demands put forward by former champion Bobby Fischer of the U.S., which at the time they vehemently opposed, but now favour since the present defending champion is a Russian. They also reportedly want approval for holding the next 1980 Olympiad in Moscow, which they are unlikely to get if they stay away.

CZERNIAK TAKES CHESS LEAD

By YA'ACOV FRIEDLER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

HAIFA. — International master Moshe Czerniak took over the lead last night in the national chess championships being played at the Nof Hotel here.

In the 10th round of 15, Czerniak, who is 66 years old, beat senior master Zadok Domnits and went to the head of the table with 7½ points. Next in line is Meir Rom, who had led up to last night, with 7 points and two unfinished games, followed by Radaashkovich (6½) and Kagan (6, and two unfinished games).

In the fifth round of women's play, champion Olga Fodorjanskaya went into the lead with 5 points after beating 12-year-old Esther Shamir. Lea Nudelman is now in second place, with 4 points and one unfinished game. Play continues today.

Ford regains lead over Reagan

PORTLAND, Oregon. — President Ford regained the Republican party delegate lead over challenger Ronald Reagan on Saturday and said it would propel him to a first-ballot victory at the Republican convention in August.

"I'm very, very pleased," Ford told reporters after hearing he had swept 18 Vermont delegates, outdueling Reagan 28 to 4 in Kansas and was the choice of 88 Pennsylvania delegates polled at a state convention.

In Virginia delegate races, Reagan outpolled Ford 11 to 3. Like the Pennsylvania delegates, Virginia delegates are not officially bound to any candidate, but were expressing their preferences on Saturday.

Ford said he is optimistic of gaining about 120 of New York's uncommitted delegates when they meet today.

The delegate actions gave the President a 561-540 lead over Reagan, who had grabbed the delegate lead with victories in Indiana, Georgia and Alabama on May 4. Some 1,130 votes are needed to nominate.

Ford was in Oregon campaigning for votes in one of six primary nominating elections scheduled tomorrow. A total of 176 delegates are at stake and Ford is a solid favorite to win only in Oregon. Kentucky and Tennessee are rated toss-ups and Reagan is favored by the political observers to win in Idaho, Arkansas and Nevada.

On the Democratic side, Cyrus Vance, who advises presidential contender Jimmy Carter on foreign affairs, said yesterday the U.S. would go to war if necessary to keep Israel from being driven into the sea.

Vance, mentioned as a possible secretary of state in a Carter administration, also said a preliminary agreement between the U.S. and the Soviet Union would be a necessary step to Mideast peace. (AP)

K boosts ties by Stockholm, Bonn trips

STOCKHOLM. — U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger arrived here yesterday after an eight-hour meeting with West German leaders including Foreign Minister Hans Dietrich Genscher in Bonn for another session of personal strengthening of relations with America's NATO partners.

About 13,000 leftists surrounded the U.S. embassy here to denounce Kissinger's visit in the largest protest demonstration against a foreign diplomat the city has ever seen, police said.

Protesters lined a two-mile route from a downtown park to the embassy, carrying such banners as "Kissinger go to hell," "Kissinger murderer."

In Bonn, Kissinger said that "U.S.-West German relations have never been better." Talks there centered on NATO problems, East-West relations, and economic matters. (UPI)

Saudis oppose Libyan oil hike bid

TRIPOLI. — Libya will ask for an increase in oil prices at this week's meeting of Opec ministers. Petroleum Industry Minister Ezzedin Mabrouk said yesterday.

Ministers of the 13 nations belonging to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will meet in Bali, Indonesia, on Thursday to set prices.

The Libyan news agency Arna quoted Mabrouk as saying that Libya was concerned for the international economy.

"But it is also concerned for the interests of its people and the peoples of the Third World," he added. "When we decide to increase oil prices, we have our own categorical and logical reasons. The consumer states are increasing their prices every day, and inflation tends to increase daily while our oil prices are very low."

"If we had followed inflation since 1973-74, we would have had to sell at $18 per barrel instead of the present $12," he said.

In Teheran, Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ahmed Zaki Yamani said his country will oppose any further oil price hikes during the current year at the conference in Bali.

Yamani, in Teheran for consultation with Iranian Interior Minister Jamsil Amouzgar, was quoted as saying Opec must "try to prevent undercutting of oil prices by Opec members rather than insist upon higher oil prices."

The Saudi minister based his argument against new price increases in 1976 on the law of supply and demand, saying that if this law "dictates upon you not to increase your price now because you will gain more later, then you must follow this law." (Reuters, UPI)

Unwanted Italian election

THE YEAR 1976 is one of unending troubles for Italians. They are beset with government problems, the ailing economy, the abortion issue, the Lockheed bribery scandal, this month's earthquake catastrophe and next month's national election a year ahead of schedule: an election which no one really wants.

It is no wonder then that a significant anniversary goes unnoticed by the average Italian: the 1,500th year after the end of the Western Roman Empire. It was in the year 476 of the Christian Era that the barbarian, Odoacer, a member of the Roman Imperial Bodyguard, led German soldiers in revolt and deposed the Emperor Romulus Augustus.

Italians should do well to ponder the conclusion reached by historians who said the event was one of the most striking instances in history of a change whose magnitude was not perceived until long after it occurred.

Perhaps historians will say the same of what is happening in Italy this year. For the elections in four weeks may well end the long rule of the Christian Democrats and bring the Communists to power. The likelihood has caused a fluttering in the NATO dockets in Europe, while Secretary of State Kissinger has already sounded dire warnings about the effects of such a development on Europe and the Western alliance.

Emergency economic plan

Aldo Moro's minority government — Italy's 38th in 33 years and only about three months old when it resigned a few weeks ago to force a national election — failed to get an all-party backing for its emergency economic programme. The Christian Democrat minority had depended on the active support or abstention of the Socialists, led by Francesco De Martino, and it was the withdrawal of this support for the economic policy in January that precipitated the latest crisis.

THE TURNING POINT for the Christian Democrats came last June when the Communists took 33.5 per cent in regional elections, an improvement of 5.5 per cent on their previous result. Observers interpreted this to mean the moderate left was now willing to accept what they had previously seen to be a Communist bogey. If those who then voted Communist repeat their action next month and bring in enough others with them to put the Communists ahead of the Christian Democrats, they will have voted for a government including Communists.

The breakup of the centre-left coalition in January left the CD alone as a minority government. Discredited by exposures of corruption and torn by feuds, it was caught in a vicious tangle from which there was no escape except by agreeing to share power with the Communists.

The curious thing was that while economic chaos was basically at the root of the crisis, it was the abortion issue which was the immediate cause. It saw a Christian Democrat-Neo-Fascist lineup against the Socialists and others who wanted a liberal abortion reform bill. The Vatican-linked CD compromised to the point they were prepared to admit economic and social reasons for abortion. But the other parties to the dispute insisted that termination of pregnancy be the woman's decision alone. Combined with the economic policy dispute and the poor CD record of power, it caused a situation where the only alternative was to go to the ballot box.

Opinion polls said there would probably be a Communist-dominated left-wing majority in Parliament but indications are it is unlikely that either the Communists or the CD will get an overall majority. So the balance will be held by the other parties. These have all shared power with the CD and thus must take part of the blame for Italy's ills, but they have still retained something of a credible image which could still exert an influence.

FOR FOUR YEARS after Parliament was dissolved and another elected with virtually the same composition, Italian leaders sought to solve their myriad political, economic and social problems. But these steadily became worse. The basic political problem is that there is no right-wing majority which would not include the Fascists, and no left-wing majority which would not include the Communists.

Italian governmental rule for 30 years was based on the principle that neither Communist nor Fascist backing could be accepted without causing danger to the democratic system. Consequently, the CD had to make do with a mix of conservatives and the moderate left.

As it happens also on the tortuous path of Israel coalition politics, the result of this Italian system is that important decisions are evaded and put off, with politics becoming more and more concerned with sharing of favours among the coalition groups.

The Fascists made no headway with the electorate despite efforts to put on a respectable face, but the utterances of Communist leader Enrico Berlinguer attracted more and more public attention. Berlinguer and other Communist leaders have criticized Soviet policies and made expressions favouring independence from the Moscow grip. Many in Italy and abroad took it to mean the Italian Communists have changed in colour from red to pale pink and are no more submissive to Moscow than the French Communists.

However, Berlinguer — unlike French Communist leader Georges Marchais, who saw fit to boycott the February Soviet Party Congress in Moscow — still thought it necessary to attend the Moscow gathering as "a fraternal delegate." When the chips are down, Berlinguer obviously still retains his red hue.

This brings us to another question. Do Berlinguer and his followers really want an election now despite the favourable prognosis for their party?

IT IS OBVIOUS that the Communists would rather see the CD agonize a little while longer. Berlinguer would prefer to try his luck at the polls later than sooner in order to achieve better than a standoff decision.

Although never in power, the Italian Communists for long occupied strategic points of control. They have good parliamentary image as they lined up when necessary with the extreme right — while still voting against government programmes, thus garnering opposition popularity; they have long dominated the trade unions; they have a big say in education, the judicial apparatus and the mass media.

Campaign for abortion

Since they cannot win a clear parliamentary majority, their purpose is to join a coalition with the conservatives. Which is why they leave anti-clericalism and the campaign for abortion to other leftists.

In past weeks, the Italian Communist leaders have embarked on a campaign of making soothing noises to reassure the West that they would stay in NATO if Communists rose to power, that they would not make any change in its structure or defence budgets, that they would back the current level of Italian defence spending and agree to continue storing nuclear warheads in Italy. This makes sense, the Communists know that they would be capable of sharing in governing without alienating loans and a tough labour policy.

They have not said anything about Western reports that they see NATO membership protection against any Russian intervention in Italy, but they do say they back a "democratic version" of Communism — whatever that means. Dr. Kissinger, worried over the growing strength of the Italian Communists, resurrected the domino theory produced by John Foster Dulles 20 years ago to demonstrate that if one Southeast Asian state allowed to go Communist, others would follow. He applied it to Europe and was told by the Italian Communists that they would not allow the U.S. in the event of the country dominated by the Communists.

13 killed as Philippine hijackers blow up plane

MANILA. — Thirteen persons including three young terrorists, were killed and 22 were wounded yesterday when six hijackers blew up a Philippine Air Lines jetliner on the ground and battled government troops with guns and grenades in the southern seaport city of Zamboanga.

A defence department spokesman said the hijackers — described as "Moslem terrorists" — became "desperate" and one of them set off an explosion in the main passenger cabin with a cylindrical fragmentation grenade, causing panic among the 89 hostages and crew.

At this point, government troops deployed around Zamboanga Airport, 800 km. south of Manila, rushed upon the plane in an effort to rescue the passengers, exchanging fire with the hijackers, who in turn set off several more explosions, during which several of the passengers were killed.

The announcement said fighting was over in 15 minutes and the hijacked BACIE jet, valued at $4 m., was a "total wreck."

Three of the hijackers were killed in the fighting. The spokesman said the other three were in custody and being interrogated in Zamboanga.

The hijack drama ended almost 48 hours after it began when the six men, aged between 17 and 23, commandeered the aircraft on Friday afternoon during the return leg of a roundtrip flight between Manila and Davao City and diverted it to Zamboanga.

Investigation showed the hijackers smuggled their weapons — two .45 calibre pistols, four .38 calibre revolvers and six hand grenades — aboard the aircraft by concealing some of them inside a cake. The cake was seen handcarried by a woman, who was among those killed and who was suspected as a possible seventh hijacker, a spokesman said.

The spokesman said the hijackers must have reached a panic point since almost 48 hours had passed and their demands for a $375,000 ransom and a substitute long-range DCS jet to fly them to the Middle East still had not been met. (A.P. Reuter, UPI)

Ulster security passes from army to police

BELFAST, Northern Ireland. — British Government will not let Northern Ireland, Cabinet Minister Merlyn Rees reiterated yesterday.

Rees, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, spoke against increased speculation over a British Army withdrawal, following his announcement that the primacy of police will be restored. Some security duties handed by the 15,000 strong British Army force will be given back to the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC), Rees said.

Spokesmen for the IRA's military Provisional wing said the shift security duties from the British soldiers to the RUC looked like start of a transfer of power to militant Protestant leaders the beginning of a prelude to a final British withdrawal.

HERE ARE 1,500 Rotarians scattered throughout Israel from Haifa to Eilat in 39 chapters. They include Jewish, Arab and Druze members, united, according to Lucien Harris, by a common determination to serve. "Rotary's official belief, in fact, is 'to encourage and assist the ideal of service'."

"The President of Rotary International, Ernesto Imbassahy de Gello, who visited us a few months ago, summed up the aims of Rotary as safeguarding the dignity of the individual and enhancing the quality of life," Harris says. "I think that this is putting it very well."

Rotary in Israel has devoted a great deal of its effort to helping young and talented people from poor areas to further their studies. Scholarship funds have been set up to enable such children to finish high school and go on to community colleges or universities, or to get vocational training. Academic students may receive scholarships to diversities abroad through Rotary International. Considerable attention is devoted to exchange programmes, with Israelis sent to study abroad and foreign students brought here.

"We will serve as hosts to 22 European teenagers this summer," Harris remarks. "and when I say hosts, I mean hosts. They live with Rotarians, not in hotels. In the autumn we will send two han-

As part of a vocational service programme, Rotarians in many cities advise teenagers on career choices, and help demobilized soldiers to find suitable jobs.

A great effort has been devoted to collecting funds for vitally needed medical equipment, such as coronary care units, heart ambulances, and kidney machines.

THERE ARE 785,000 Rotarians in 16,721 clubs in 151 countries in the world. According to its constitution, Rotary is strictly non-political, and does not take a stand, for example, on U.N. decisions. But, in practice, this blind eye to politics does not always work out. Thus, although the first Rotary club in Israel, Jerusalem, was founded by well-wishers from Cairo in 1929, today none of the Arab rotary clubs recognize the existence of their Israeli fellows. Clubs on the West Bank and in East Jerusalem have not functioned since 1967.

As a result of this bad neighbour policy, Israel belongs to the ENAEM region, which comprises European, North African and East Mediterranean countries. But the band of friendship is still stretched out hopefully towards the Arab Rotarians.

Governor Harris repudiates most indignantly the slide allegation sometimes made that Rotary is a snob organization. This mistaken idea may have arisen because membership is restricted to one representative of each industry or profession, apart from diplomats, clergymen and journalists, who can join in unrestricted numbers. (The open door to journalists dispels any suspicion of snobbery.) The test of selection is not wealth, but readiness to serve.

"Nobody joins Rotary just to hear speeches once a week," Harris insists. "Everybody is given a job to do — and has to do it. As I said before, the aim is to serve."

Housing for Haifa Arabs

HAIFA — Arab residents of this city will for the first time be entitled to their own public housing, including a programme for young couples. Mayor Yehoram Zeisel announced last week at his monthly press conference.

Until now, he said, the pressing housing problems of Arab residents had been solved only on an individual basis, by the Shikmona Shum Clearance Corporation, a joint operation of the Government and the municipality. The Housing Ministry has so far approved a site near the mosque in the Khalasa Quarter for a public housing project.

Another public project for the Arab sector of the population will be a regional junior and senior high school, to be built at an outlay of IL10m., the mayor said. Arab community leaders had complained that there were not enough Government schools and that a large number of children were attending the missionary schools.

Turning to ecology, the mayor said the lower city may become a transit route for 15,000 tons of coal a day, to feed the projected power station of the Electric Corporation at Hadara.

"The transit of so much coal may be an economic benefit, but it is also an ecological hazard," he said. Experts from the Electric Corporation and the Ports Authority will study the ecological problems at coal burning power stations in Europe. The city commissioner on environment, Zvi Avni, now abroad on a UN assignment, will join the delegation, along with a city council member.

Asked what was being done to keep the city clean, the mayor deplored the manpower shortage. The permanent labour force of 440 had dropped to 400 because of retirements, deaths and illness. "While we have frozen the manpower establishment in other departments, we're ready to engage any man willing to work in city cleaning," the mayor said. "At present we have to resort to employing men from the West Bank. We are also trying to mechanize city cleaning as much as possible."

Mayor Zeisel also promised to investigate whether in the new sports centre on Ruppia Road, built at a cost of about IL15m., space had been allotted by the architects for medical tests and examinations. The Jerusalem Post received a letter from a reader who complained that while money had been found to decorate the front of the building (a city official won a city tender for the art project), the inexperienced architects had apparently overlooked the fact that a modern sports centre could not function without medical supervision and guidance.

At a session of the city executive before the press conference Mayor Zeisel congratulated the heads and residents of the three bayside towns, Kiryat Bialik, Kiryat Motzkin and Kiryat Yam, on their elevation to municipal status by the Interior Ministry this month. He said he was looking forward to continuing cooperation with them, and to the success of negotiations on a metropolitan framework for the entire area, including Haifa.

Bertolucci triumph at Cannes

CANNES — Bernardo Bertolucci, director of the controversial "Last Tango in Paris," scored a triumph at the Cannes Film Festival last Friday with a monumental fresco of Italian politics from the turn of the century.

"Novecento (1900)" runs for 5 hours 20 minutes and was shown in morning and afternoon sessions. It is the longest film ever shown at Cannes.

France's Gerard Depardieu and Italian Robert de Niro play the key roles of peasant and wealthy landowner born on the same day in 1900. Through them Bertolucci traces the class struggle in a Po Valley village, the transformation from an agricultural to an industrial society and the lingering death of certain deeply-held traditional values.

Tracing the two lives through to April 25, 1945, the day of the end of Fascism in Italy, Bertolucci gives a masterly picture of the lives of the rich and poor of the village, of the early quasi-feudal epoch and the dawn of a new era, of the farm workers' union and the predominant role of the Communist Party among the peasants.

Major supporting roles are played by Dominique Sanda, Laura Betti, Sterling Hayden, Stefania Sandrelli, Donald Sutherland and Alida Valli.

The film, which took two years to make, was backed by United Artists, Fox, and Paramount.

The director told a press conference after the final screening that he had "used the style and code of the 19th century novel, and the narrative of that century, but in a different manner and above all with a different objective."

"In the 19th century novel, the goal was always psychological, but in my film it is ideological."

MOVABLE CLOTHES LINE

FIX IT YOURSELF
MEIR FACTOR

NOW THAT the rainy season is over (or should be) clothes can again be hung out to dry instead of being draped around the bathroom. If you don't have an outside clothes line, now is the time to make one. You can, of course, buy ready drilled pipes complete with pulleys which only have to be fixed to the wall and lines attached, but from bitter experience I would not recommend this method.

To make a substantial three-line movable clothes line you will need six pulleys (the metal wheel type with an attached 1/2" bolt), six small cable joiners (mushrooms), three screw tensioners (mushrooms), two pieces of 1/2" galvanized iron pipe 60 cm. long and sufficient plastic-covered stranded steel cored clothes line (the thick line is best).

Drill three 7mm. holes through each pipe at intervals of 5 cm., 20 cm. and 35 cm. from one end. Check that the threaded pulley bolt will pass through the holes. Make a hole 25cm deep and slightly more than 1" in diameter in the outer wall where you will require the lines. You'll probably find it easier to drill a 1/2" hole and then enlarge it with a hammer and a cold chisel (careful). Test that the pipe will fit in the hole to the required depth. Remove the pipe and fill the hole with a mortar mixture (one part of cement to four parts of sand, adding sufficient water to make a stiff mix), and knock the pipe into the hole so that the drilled holes are parallel to the ground. Repeat with the other pipe. Leave the pipes a day or so to allow the mortar to set.

Bolt the pulley wheels tightly to the pipes. Lean out of one window, thread one end of the line down and under the outer pulley and attach a weight to this end. Throw the weighted line to an assistant leaning out over the other pipe. He has to feed the line under and over the outer pulley and throw it back. Slacken off the cable tensioners. Join the end of the line to the hook end of one of the tensioners and hold firmly with a cable anchor. Pass the other end of the line through the eye of the tensioner, pull the cable as taut as possible and again hold firmly with a cable anchor.

The cable tensioner which should be on the upper loop of the line if you've threaded the pulleys correctly can now be tightened up. Feed the attached line through the next pulley from top to bottom and then haul the completed line over, pulling the attached line with it. Now cut it away from the loop, feed through the pulley, bottom to top, tie to the eye of the tensioner and haul back over to the other side and attach to a tensioner as with the first line. Repeat the process with the last line and have your assistant ensure that the end of the line is not lost.

IN A RECENT article on installing a fluorescent lamp I was taken to task by an alert reader for not mentioning that an earth connection should be used with a fluorescent fitting because of the high voltage developed. In fact, because in a ceiling lamp fixture there is no earth lead, a special one has to be run in from the nearest junction box containing an earth connection. Under no circumstances should a fluorescent fitting be installed in a bathroom or any other damp place without an efficient earth connection.

Another reader writes with reference to puncture repairs that contact glue (devex magis) should never be used. Although I have used this myself very successfully, I nevertheless agree with him that a rubber adhesive specially made for the job is preferable.

BATIK ROUND-UP

By Joanna Yehiel / Jerusalem Post Reporter

NO LESS than three exhibitions of batik have been shown to the press and public in the last several days, giving a good example of how varied this art technique can be.

In Jerusalem's House of Quality, Jerusalemite Diana Zvulmi is showing (through May 28) her collection of batik on silk — silk dresses, blouses, long flowing scarves and square ones, cushions, and wall pictures. Used to seeing batik worked on to cotton, it took me a moment to realize how well silk suits the technique — the fabric's soft, flowing, slightly shiny look adapts beautifully to the curves and overlap of the colours.

Diana grew up in a moshav, and her delight in natural things — earth colours, trees, leaves, water — shows clearly in her work. She is increasingly leaning towards the abstract, but the items have a movement all of their own, like wind blowing through trees, or water slipping over leaves in a stream.

Her prices are fair for such an expensive fabric and in case you miss the exhibition (Sun. through Thurs. 10 to 19.00; Friday, 10 to 13.00), she usually has an item or two on display in the permanent exhibit downstairs.

AT BEIT MASKIT in Jerusalem's Rav Kook Street, Alexandra (Zaid)

is showing her collection of batik summer dresses and suits. The batik here is mainly abstract — the colours bright and lively, and the design and cut of the clothes, by Alexandra herself, makes a complete picture of the outfit. Alexandra's clothes, of hand-wearing cotton, are made to be worn. They range from caftans (ideal if you're pregnant or not so model-slim), apron sundresses and two-piece sets, often with their own matching headscarf.

On the basement floor of Maskit in Tel Aviv's El Al building, there was until recently a special exhibit of batiks by Rina Cooper, many of which are still on display at the store.

The batiks, their figurative designs mostly based on ancient Egyptian and Indian motifs, are more muted in colour than the general run. Rina Cooper has used them for wall hangings, lampshades of varying sizes (the materials come to life beautifully with the light shining through), dresses and tablecloths.

Most interesting are her painted table tops. She has used batik on wood, a technique rarely seen in this country although it is very similar to batik on cloth. The small coffee tables have the look of a free-flowing marquetry, without the static, decorative look of that art.

"Erosion" by Jacob Gildor

FANTASTIC REALISM

Haifa Art Notes / Ephraim Harris

ACOV GILDOR — Mixed technique, chiefly depicting fantastic realism, noticeably against a background of distant hills, but extending in one direction, to the edge of realism ("Still Life," a perfume bottle on a book, a framed portrait and Tobey jug, in front of a wide landscape); and, in another, to night realism (his rock themes, landscape) a man's head carved in cliff, and "Rock," an old man's head; a male face caught when the strapped halves of a helmet is a related item). The level styles and varied subjects is unusual at times but when all the elements and their delineation coincide, work is very good, especially in the series. For example, "Meeting at a pipe-smoking centaur and a ted man of wood, carrying a bow; small cloaked nude of "Fluttering man," where the light lies within figure. Elsewhere relief is provided by different thicknesses of line and the case of a nude within a man's head, light breaks below the hilly horizon. Of other items outside this group, one should mention the grey portrait of a man on brown, whose white collar, offset by a bow tie, separates the head from the bust; and "The Bear," the male forming a beakish triangle protruding from an oldish, pleasant looking woman's ear. Several paintings have a religious connotation ("Graphics 3" Gallery). Till June 8.

ILSE JAKOB has three oils in bold colours which are dynamic: firstly, "Composition," reducing its motifs to abstraction; "Landscape" stopping short at near formalisation but a trifle raw; and "Elmeret" more realist in the same direction but requiring far greater proportioning of the constituent motifs. Otherwise the realist landscapes are poor. As to her flowers, no hesitation in selecting the admirable (30) in red and yellow. The watercolour landscapes, naturalistic, have some composition where water plays a role. The most alive, no water included, is the impressionist "House at Shavel Tsiyon." (Rits Gallery). Till June 18.

manpower the company needed
then.
Four years later, with a World War and hundreds of thousands of soldiers in this area, the plant grew,
and received special preference
since it was producing something very important to soldiers.

Mr. Tabori said that the boom
continued during all the British Mandate up to the very last day.
"They took several truckloads of soft drinks with them to their ships at Haifa when they left the country, and they haven't paid for them to this day," he noted wryly.
During the War of Independence
it was the only one of the more than 100 bottling plants that agreed to sell to Shechem. "My theory was simple: if we have a state, I'll get paid, if there isn't a state, then I won't have a plant anyhow."

Even during the austerity after the War of Independence soft drinks were a going thing. In 1954 he and Moshe Borenstein founded Tempo,
but after a short time the partnership broke up and Tabori sold his part to Mr. Borenstein.
In 1955, Tabori started Cristal,
introducing the family size bottle
in 1961. A short time later he opened plants in Bat Yam and Beersheva and started with Tropi soft drinks.

All three plants use well water,
which Tabori claims is the best and easiest to treat for use in mineral water and soft drinks.
Why are they the lowest priced
soft drinks? "This is a matter of history. All the soft drink manufacturers managed to raise their prices before our branch became a price controlled branch. Since then all the price changes are based on the way we stood then."

"Forcing us to sell at a lower price has some advantages too.
First, in sales. Second, it has forced us to become more efficient; whatever can be is computerized. Also,
because of the geographical locations of our plants, we save in distributing costs. All three plants produce the same quality drinks so this is not a problem," he said.

Mr. Tabori, who is now 60, is grooming his two sons to take over. Yigal is finishing his B.A. in economics in Jerusalem and Ilan is completing his studies in business administration in Boston.

Mr. Tabori is also facing the future by bringing in more automation.

"It is already hard to find
workers who are willing to work
the second or third shifts, and the five-day work week is already

Ya'acov Tabori

around the corner. The manufacturer who has machines and can work a five-day week on one shift
is the one who will stay in business," he predicts.

Tabori would like a work day of 9 to 10 hours with service mechanics working at a later hour. In this way, when the workers come in the next day their machines would already be serviced.

In any case, the workers seem to be happy. "You have to know how to treat workers, make them
partners and explain to them what you are planning and how it will be to their benefit," he said.

Automatism plea rejected

The Supreme Court dismissed an appeal against a judgment of the Jerusalem District Court delivered
on May 20, 1975 (in Cr.C. 251/74).
The Jerusalem Municipality decided to demolish an unauthorized building in Malcha, Jerusalem, and a tractor-cum-driver, accompanied by 20 policemen, was sent to the spot for that purpose. Some of the local inhabitants objected violently to this decision and in the ensuing altercation Nahum Hamis
"captured" the tractor and went berserk with it, using it to overturn two police vehicles, one of which held four policemen, and to destroy an electric pylon, and drive it wildly at groups of policemen and bystanders. He was eventually overpowered and later brought to trial on charges of attempted murder, assaulting policemen and causing damage to property.

Hamis' only defence at his trial
was that he had lost consciousness
and had no control over his actions.
The District Court dismissed this defence of "automatism," found Hamis guilty on all charges and sentenced him to four years' imprisonment.

He appealed against his conviction
to the Supreme Court.

Mr. I. Lustigman appeared for the appellant and Mr. I. Horwitz, Assistant State Attorney, for the State.

JUDGMENT

The President, who delivered the judgment of the Supreme Court, Justice Barak and Judge Selsky
concurring, noted that a great deal
had been written lately on the subject of "automatism" as a defence
in criminal actions and the conclusions of the learned authors could be summed up as being that automatism is an involuntary action performed in a state of unconsciousness not amounting to insanity in the legal sense.

Anyone pleading "automatism," continued the President, must satisfy the court that there is at least a prima facie basis for this plea,
since a person must be presumed,
in the ordinary course of events,
to be capable of exerting sufficient self-control in order to refrain from committing criminal acts. And unless this prima facie basis is later
rebutted beyond all reasonable doubt
by the prosecution, then the accused would be entitled to be exempted from criminal liability for his actions. Or, in other words, "it is for the defence to carry the evidentiary burden of producing some evidence
in support of a plea of automatism,
but for the prosecution to carry the persuasive burden of disproving
automatism beyond reasonable doubt" (see Howard on Automatism
and Insanity, Sydney Law Review,
vol. 4, p. 37; and Cr.A. 415/68, 2
P.D. 22/68).

In the case under consideration,
continued the President, the appellant's counsel had argued that the defence of automatism is based,
from a legal viewpoint, on section 11(1) of the Criminal Code Ordinance (which provides that a person is not criminally responsible for an act which occurs independently of the exercise of his will),
and that on the presumption that
the appellant had driven the tractor
while in a state of unconsciousness of what was happening to him, or around him, he must be exempted from criminal responsibility for lack of mens rea.
However, he held, if it appeared that the prosecution had succeeded in showing that the appellant's actions at the relevant time had been fully conscious and voluntary, this would undermine his claim of automatism.

The President then went on to a detailed examination of the facts and circumstances of the case and came to the conclusion that even

REPORT

Edited by Doris Lankin

if the defence had succeeded in proving that there was a prima facie basis for the plea of automatism — and this was not at all certain — the prosecution had rebutted this plea beyond all reasonable doubt.

In explaining this conclusion the President discussed, amongst other things, the appellant's counsel's argument that the District Court had not been entitled to rely on the television film of the events in order to reach some of their factual findings, as the film was inadmissible, having been subjected to editing. In dismissing this argument he had recourse to American jurisprudence, which has established the rule that motion pictures are as admissible in evidence
as ordinary photographs, on condition that they are proved to be authentic and that they accurately and impartially portray the matter at issue. There is no doubt, he held, that the television film in question complied with these criteria.

Furthermore, the question of admissibility of a film comes within the discretion of the trial court
and there was no cause for interfering with the District Court's exercise of its discretion in this case. And in any event, he added,
a motion picture may be deemed to be a silent witness, or a witness which speaks for itself, and this justified the District Court's reliance on the impression they had received from the television film (see also Wigmore on Evidence
vol. 3, p. 213).

As to the argument, continued
the President, that the television film in question had been edited by cutting, American jurisprudence
on the subject has laid down that cutting a film is not sufficient to disqualify it as admissible evidence,
although it might affect its weight
as evidence, if the cutting tends to make the film misleading. The particular film in question, however, he held, had not been cut
in any way, according to the photographer's testimony, and faithfully portrayed the true course of events. So that there was no cause for not giving the film its full weight as evidence of the events which took place at the time.

The conclusion to be drawn from the evidence before the District Court, the President went on to hold, is that the appellant had acted in a fit of temper, but that he had been completely conscious of his actions at the time and capable of controlling them."

In conclusion the President considered the appellant's counsel's complaint against the undue interference of the District Court in the process of examination of the witnesses. He thought, he said, that there was more than a modicum of truth in this allegation as an examination of the records shows that the District Court judges often interrupted the course of the opposing counsel's examination of their witnesses by interposing innumerable questions of their own and had even engaged in exaggerated exchanges with counsel themselves.

It should be remembered, the President counselled, that in accordance with sections 156 and 157
of the Criminal Procedure Law, it is only upon completion of the examination of the witnesses by opposing counsel that the court may examine the witnesses, although the court is entitled to do so during the examination of the parties if something requires clarification. It can be gathered from these provisions, continued the President,
that the legislature had intended
the adversary system of judicature to be perpetuated, while at the same time empowering the court itself to examine witnesses —
albeit at the proper time — in order to ensure, in so far as possible, that the truth be revealed and justice be done. The courts should not, therefore, he held, indulge too often in the practice of questioning witnesses during the course of their examination by counsel, as this could interfere with the order and sequence of questioning planned by the counsel
in question and hamper his conduct of the case (see also Cr.A.
29/49, P.D. 3/49).

However, concluded the President,
although the District Court might occasionally have interfered too much in the examination of the witnesses in the present case they had not done so on a scale likely to cause injustice and most of their questions had been for the purpose of clarifying obscure points in the witnesses' testimony.

Appeal dismissed.
Judgment given on April 30, 1976.

Israel exports to UK

By MARK SEGAL

Jerusalem Post Correspondent
NDON. — Anglo-Israel trade figures show a 48 per cent increase in Israel's exports to the U.K. area,
from £28.5m. in 1974 to £42.5m. for January to March this year as compared to £28.5m. for the same period last year.

British exports to Israel dropped to £62m. for the first quarter 1975
from £67.8m. for the same period this year.

The figures were reported this week by Lewis Goodman, chairman of the Anglo-Israel Chamber of Commerce. He also announced a reger of the 26-year-old chamber in the eight-year-old Economic Council for Israel, which encourages Israel's exports to Britain.
Goodman said they were heeding Premier Rabin's call on world
to strengthen Israel's economic capabilities.

British exports to Israel came to £12.2m. in 1974 and £27.2m.
in 1975. The largest single item was rough diamonds (£107.7m.
in 1974 — £112.5m. in 1975). In-ports to the UK from Israel totalled £7m. in 1974 and £91.3m. in 1975.

The two biggest items were fruit and vegetables (£39.2m. in 1974 and £47.2m. in 1975) and polished diamonds (£28.1m. — 1974; £10.8m. — 1975).
Britain's trade surplus with Israel increased from £14m. in 1974 to £16m. in 1975. The UK also increased its share of Israel's total imports from 13 per cent in 1974
to 17 per cent last year. Israel is Britain's 21st largest customer, exceeding each of the Arab countries.

Thus demands for the British Government to be more active in advising British firms to ignore the Arab boycott were fully justified,
not only on moral grounds but in the light of Anglo-Israel trade figures, Goodman said.

Goodman said the problem of increasing trade was not only getting the British to buy from Israel but to persuade Israelis to adjust to British demands: "The unwelcome
letters," he said, "are the ones
which say to the Israeli businessman that he has to do business with Israel at first, but by now things have been ironed out, and I enjoy doing business with Israeli manufacturers."

CHARTER HOLDUP RAPPEL

Jerusalem Post Reporter

The Transport Ministry's Civil Aviation Directorate was charged yesterday with delaying the start of a charter flight programme which would bring thousands of U.S. servicemen stationed in Europe for a one-week holiday in Israel.

Arthur Hoffman, representing the Neckermann tour, one of the largest charter operators in Europe, told a press conference in Jerusalem
that he had received formal assurance from the Directorate that permission for U.S. military personnel and their dependants in Europe and Turkey had been approved by the Government. But he said that all efforts on the part of Neckermann
to obtain clearance for the operation have met with procrastination.
First charges were made by scheduled airlines, who may apply for permission to the International Air Travel Association for the sale of part of their accommodation at charter rates.

Hoffman, a former colonel of the U.S. Air Force, said Neckermann has been assured by foreign airlines serving Israel that IATA permission did not pose a problem.
His complaint follows the report

last week by the Israel Hotel Association that Barjet, a Los Angeles
charter firm, has expressed "surprise and disappointment" at the Civil Aviation Directorate's fresh delay of charter flights from the U.S. West Coast. The flights were due to start on May 17.

The American reaction was reported by Moshe Amir, director-general of the Association, currently in the U.S. to promote charter operations to Israel.
Amir added that U.S. aviation circles believe El Al has caused the cancellation of a number of the West Coast charter flights set for the months of May and June. He quoted the circles as saying that even if the Civil Aviation Directorate now gives its approval, the flights cannot begin before July.

The Hotel Association said postponement of the scheduled flights has resulted in the loss to Israel of hundreds of thousands of dollars.
The Association's official release this week expressed fears that the "delaying tactics on the part of El Al
and the Transport Ministry's Directorate may result in putting off
charter from the U.S. for another
year."

British Leyland denies break with Israel

LONDON. — British Leyland is committed to continuing its trade
with Israel irrespective of its removal from the Arab boycott list, according to a letter from the chief executive of the British firm, Alex Park to Greville Janner, M.P., vice-president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Park wrote to Janner that "while we are pleased to be off the Arab boycott list, we will continue to trade with Israel and sincerely hope to do so in the long term future."

This was in reply to an enquiry from Janner following press reports that British Leyland, a government company, would stop trading with Israel. Park said in his letter that British Leyland had not given any such undertaking to the Arab boycott committee.

The company apparently was removed from the boycott list after it agreed to build an assembly plant
in Egypt. Negotiations were expedited during President Sadat's visit to London last year.

Dan Hotel change after 25 years

Tel Aviv's Dan Hotel, which has hitherto had the distinction of being run by the same manager since its opening nearly a quarter-century
ago, has finally made a change.

Paul Silberstein, who has held the post in the five-star hotel since 1953, has been appointed adviser to the Dan hotel group, which also owns
the King David in Jerusalem, Dan Carmel in Haifa, and Dan Caesarea.

His replacement is 30-year old Rafi Sade, a sabra graduate of the Lausane hotel school who has been Silberstein's assistant since Septem-

Jerusalem Post Reporter
IL AVIV. — Ignited by optimism
concerning the possibility of a com-

The General Index rose by 0.83
cent to stand at 128.79 points.
Reports in the press concerning the linkage of the Israel pound cur-

to the Nafat investment dollar as it

new all-time high only $112,000
changed hands.

The bond sector, not to be out-

Especially active on the higher side
were optional loans with longer-term
redemptions, 6.5 per cent Defence Loan bonds and Defence Loan 68/69.
The 10-year index-linked bonds were moderately higher. Dollar-linked bonds were also higher, while dollar-

Hard way to recovery

THERE HAS BEEN a spate of denunciations against the Government for over-spending. Last week Professor Michael Bruno, in the first press interview since his resignation from the post of Adviser to the Finance Minister, stated flatly that taxes should not be increased. It is budgetary expenditure that has to be slashed, and by ILA,000m, he said.

Last week was also marked by a spate of labour clashes within individual companies — Steel City, Leyland Motors, SBL Engineering and others — over the other side of Bruno's coin: the cutbacks and dismissals made necessary by the self-same policy of budgetary restraint.

In order to understand the reluctance of Finance Minister Rabinowitz to slice allocations further and to make industrial loans costlier, it is necessary to recognise that the result of such measures will be an extension of what is happening in Leyland Motors and Steel City to other enterprises and services all over the country.

This is in fact what Bruno's recommendations are all about. This is why it is so much easier to spell them out than to apply them. And yet they must be applied — for two irrefutable reasons.

The first is that all the undertakings which are over-manned in Israel are in any case going to be shedding their surplus labour sooner or later. It is not an economist's caprice that compels firms to retrench, with all the suffering and inconvenience this entails.

It is the shocking discovery that the money is beginning to run out, that there are going to be no reserves left with which to bail the country out of its deficits. The justification for immediate action is this: the sooner corrective action is taken, the less dismissals there will have to be.

The second good reason for adopting Bruno's budget-cutting formula is that the men and women who are pressed to leave their present jobs do not — so far — face unemployment. The problem in this country today (happily) is not that there is less work than work-seekers. Each over-manned activity is matched by another activity which is under-manned, notably in the export industries.

Indeed the problem is not an excess of human labour, but its misallocation as between the domestic and export sectors. The hardship for the individual is not that he has to go out on the street — but that he has to change his workplace.

It is difficult to make a change, especially for senior employees who are used to their jobs. But it can be done, as is shown by those, in Friedman, for example, who were recently dismissed for the same reasons of economic stringency and are now working in other places of employment.

The aim is to transfer 10,000 people this year; a figure quoted by the Manufacturers' Association (whose members cannot all take kindly to this painful transformation either). The switch should be seen as a costly, but at the same time constructive, investment, not only in the economy at large, but in the worker himself.

It is better for him to find a new niche in a growth undertaking that has a future, than cling obstinately to a loss-making concern which depends on State subsidies for its survival.

Serious Arab unrest

HA'ARETZ (Independent) says that the news of serious unrest in Syria as a result of its intervention in Lebanon is tendentious, and originates with the Egyptians and the Communist left in Lebanon. What unrest there may be is not such as to endanger the regime. The only real threat would come from the army, and this would not be influenced by the presence or absence of unrest outside its ranks.

AL HAMSHARA (Mapam) feels that the hostile elements abroad are eager to enlist the Arabs in Israel in the overall Arab front against the country. "Israel's task accordingly is to try to put an end to the frustration, bitterness and sense of discrimination among Israel's Arabs. It is a complex problem. Israel's Arabs must be integrated as equal citizens, but without having to deny their natural feelings of nationalism, and this will demand a delicate, long-term approach. In general, the more Israel's Arabs feel they are citizens with equal rights, the less will be the influence of hostile outside factors."

HATZOFE (National Religious) notes that France plays a pernicious role in watering down extremist Arab resolutions to make them more palatable to the West while retaining their anti-Israeli essence. This is the case with the latest such resolution, regarding the dispatch of a U.N. representative to investigate the situation in the administered territories.

In the European Common Market, too, France plays a negative role, being the only member to oppose financial assistance to Israel. In general, France is now in the front rank of nations opposed to Israel, though in effect it has been doing nothing in return from the Arabs.

POSTSCRIPTS

PILGRIMAGE YEAR is catching on in the United Kingdom, according to our London correspondent, and El Al hopes to bring at least another 5000 British pilgrims here during the coming months. A flip to the movement has been given by the formation of a Holy Land Pilgrimage Advisory Service, inspired by Canon Peter Schneider, formerly aide to the Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem and now a consultant on inter-faith relations to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Canon Schneider, who knows this country well, recently made a return visit during which he kept a travel diary. Two of his notes make particularly interesting reading.

"The part," he writes, "penetrates into the present actuality of the Holy Land... Today, the majority Jewish setting of both Jerusalem and Israel as a whole is a reversal to the situation as Jesus knew it" (italics ours).

Of the road to Bethlehem, Canon Schneider writes: "I saw no star, but as I drove through a new high-rise housing settlement, I could not help but be struck with the appropriateness that the road to Bethlehem afforded new homes to Jewish immigrants."

ISRAELI television viewers are not the only ones to refuse invitations when Edward VII or The Pathfinders are on the air, or to make it a condition that unscripted guests watch with them. English TV programmes seem to be sweeping the world and

For considerations of their own, neither Syria nor Egypt is likely to attack Israel in the next two years, writes MAX SINGER. And he predicts that for several years to come there will be no real U.S. pressure on Israel.

Is U.S. pressure a bogey?

THE IDEA driving U.S. policy since the Yom Kippur War has been that if it did not induce "movement" toward a settlement of the Israel-Arab conflict there would be another war, another oil embargo, and another U.S.-Soviet confrontation. But when the new (or re-elected) President reviews the Middle East situation next winter, his advisers — if they are honest — will have to tell him that even if he doesn't do anything in the Middle East it is highly likely that there will be no war for at least a year or two.

Egypt, he will be told, is reluctant to get into a war because they are in the process of changing their source of arms from Russia to the West. The process could take ten years — or forever. Tanks and planes need spare parts if they are to be used for training and to keep forces ready for action. It is not yet clear, probably even to Sadat, how large a supply of spare parts he can get from the various countries that have similar equipment, assuming the Soviets refuse to send him what he needs.

Egypt's tank and air fleets are large on the world scale. It will be difficult for Sadat to get enough on a bootleg basis, particularly if the Soviet Union really wants to prevent this. By cannibalizing parts he can keep a force which in peacetime gets smaller only gradually — and perhaps add new units with Western equipment to maintain his strength. But the force would be used up quite quickly in a major war and he may not see where a replacement for it will come from.

Incidentally, we should not suppose that Egypt's break with Moscow is any more permanent than her previous alliance was. Either under Sadat, or a successor, Egypt can move quickly back into active cooperation with the Soviet Union. So long as Egypt's main forces are equipped with Soviet tanks and planes this will be by far the quickest way for Egypt to restore its military strength and to maintain a constant temptation, especially for the military. (This is not to deny that there would also be disadvantages for Egypt in a renewal of her alliance with Russia.)

Egypt, of course, also has non-military reasons for avoiding a big war in the next few years. The Egyptian people have been told that they won a great victory in 1973, and Sadat must now do his utmost to restore the flagging economy if disaster is to be avoided.

One critical point must be borne in mind. The distaste for a big war on

WHILE EGYPT will be reluctant to get involved in a big war because of the problem of military equipment, and perhaps for other reasons too, Syria will probably be reluctant to have a big war because it will be fully occupied with its attempt to establish a dominant position in Lebanon and Jordan. While population is far from being the only element of international power, it is useful to keep in mind the following population relationships:

Egypt	38 million
Saudi Arabia	5 million
Syria	7 million
Iraq	10 million
Lebanon	3 million
Jordan	2½ million

If Syria is able, in effect, to add Lebanon and Jordan's weight to her own, the basic balance between Syria and Iraq — her main rival — would be substantially altered. Syria would also become clearly the main challenger in the Arab Middle East to Egyptian leadership. Finally, such an expansion of Syrian influence might go a long way to strengthening the hold on power in Syria of Assad's Alawite minority Government.

The process Syria began last year of bringing Lebanon under her effective control and advancing her relationship with Jordan is likely to be a long and delicate one. There will be resistance not only from local elements but from other Arab regimes, who are not at all eager to see an expansion of Syrian power. Increased conflict between Syria and Iraq is likely to require great attention in Damascus and will need to be resolved before Syria is in a position for another war with Israel. (In general, conflict within the Arab world may be an additional factor preventing a war during the next year or so.)

Right now it does not look as though a war with Israel would help Assad at all in his effort to bring Lebanon and Jordan into Syria's orbit — a goal which must exert a tremendous powerful attraction for him. On the contrary, a war could ruin the whole effort. In any event, he may not have the time to work on both problems simultaneously. This situation could change, particularly if Israel lets its guard down, but this does not seem likely. Any threat of war from Syria so long as the current state of affairs continues should therefore be regarded with great scepticism.

One critical point must be borne in mind. The distaste for a big war on the part of Israel's enemies does not mean that Israel can afford to relax. Egypt, for example, certainly will continue to have sufficient forces for a small war, say a division-size attack, aimed at grabbing some piece of Sinai. Such a small war might offer tempting gains, particularly if the world recognizes Egypt's inability to start a big war and her diplomacy suffers as a result.

There are two ways in which Israel can protect itself from the danger of a little war. Both are difficult. The first is to make sure that Israel can defeat any attack and that it is ready to respond immediately with a compensating attack, so that even if the war is ended after the second or third day Israel will have gained more than its attacker. The second, and probably more important, is to make sure that Israel's enemies are afraid that if they do start what they plan as a small war, they will not be able to stop it from escalating into a big war — in which they will be badly defeated.

TO RETURN to the main thread of the argument, if the new President is advised that even if the U.S. refrains from taking Middle East initiatives (such as trying to push the Rogers Plan down Israel's throat) there is not much danger of a war in the Middle East for at least a year or two, there is a good chance that he will turn his attention to more pressing issues.

Of course, this is not necessarily so. The new (or re-elected) President could try to be a "statesman" and say that sooner or later the Arab-Israeli war will flare up and that he has a duty to use U.S. power to try to settle it forthwith. But that would be looking for trouble. There will be no lack of issues demanding the President's attention. He may well conclude that it would be easier and safer to settle the conflict later, or more slowly. In any event, it will be tempting for him to wait at least until after the Israeli elections.

What I am suggesting is that while the verbal heat on Israel will probably continue no real pressure is to be expected for several years. How Israel should exploit that time is another subject — but it would surely not hurt if it improved the balance of payments.

UNRWA MEDICAL SERVICES IN GAZA

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post
Sir, — I refer to the article by Christine Doyle, Medical Correspondent of the London "Observer," entitled "Foreign Correspondent in Gaza" (May 11).

The article discusses, among other topics, medical services to refugees in the Gaza Strip. In fact, there are 329,000 refugees registered with UNRWA in Gaza, including 264,306 refugees eligible for assistance, of whom 833 are ration recipients. A number of registered refugees live inside the eight UNRWA camps in Gaza. In 1974, whilst the number, including outside the camps is 131,000, totalling 329,108 refugees.

Beach (Shati) Refugee Camp, which the article refers to, is one of eight camps. It has a population of 33,450 registered refugees, with outside Beach Camp there are 12 other registered refugees, bring the total of registered refugees and outside Beach Camp in G. Town up to 47,717 and not around 600 as the article states.

SOVIET IMMIGRATION

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post
Sir, — The report of a 50 per cent drop-out rate among emigrants at the Vienna transit camp (May 8) leads one to wonder if the blame extends somewhat beyond the Jewish Agency. Is it possible, for instance, that the Soviet Government has deliberately been issuing visas to individuals most likely to drop out while denying them to individuals most likely to make aliyah? Such a policy would be entirely consistent with the Soviet Government's ongoing attempts to discredit aliyah among Russian Jews and to destroy sympathy for it among non-Jews in the West. It should be recalled that

BRITISH IMMIGRATION

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post
Sir, — In your report, "British Zionists take over own aliyah effort" (May 8), you mention that the British Aliya Movement has been active in the last few years. As the immediate past national chairman of the British Aliya Movement, I must inform you that we were in fact the most active group working for aliyah in the United Kingdom. The last word that would describe the efforts of my committee and myself would be inactive. Before I came on aliyah last September, I had seen the British Aliya Movement become a truly national movement. We had established aliyah groups the length and breadth of the U.K. Most of these groups met at least once a week and organized Hebrew lessons and generally guided the potential immigrant about life in Israel. We worked very closely with the emissaries and most important of all, many members of HAM came on aliyah.

Mr. Sidney Shipton is quoted as saying that to "appoint an aliyah director is something of a revolution." I would say that it is a revolution doomed to failure. Only way that we can encourage aliyah from any country is to have motivation starting from Israel: the back up coming from local interested groups. How can the British Zionist Federation or any of Zionist body be a prime mover aliyah when most of the money never come on aliyah themselves? In Israel must show by example aliyah does work. We should encourage the number of emissaries not reducing them and develop the partnership between them and the local aliyah committee.

VIEWPOINT / MENDEL KOHANSKY

The Israel Prize: Thoughts on Kishon's Afterthoughts

IN HIS article "The Israel Prize: Afterthoughts" (The Jerusalem Post, May 20), Ephraim Kishon deals with the "conscience-stricken intellectual," who emerges from under the celebrated humorist's pen as a truly frightening phenomenon.

According to Mr. Kishon, the conscience-stricken intellectual "will argue that the people of Baram and Irit were driven off their land and resettled elsewhere by fraud and deception, whereas the Jews of Hebron were butchered by right." He also "can see the point of an Arafat, and is impressed by the legitimate rights of the Palestinian liberation movements to come at our schoolkids with hatchets."

I read this with mounting disbelief. Where did Ephraim Kishon find this monster with murder in his heart? Has he heard him speak in public? Has he read what he wrote? Can he mention names?

I am a conscience-stricken intellectual myself — my conscience has bothered me for quite a while now — and most of the people with whom I associate socially and professionally belong to the same species. I never heard any of them justify the 1929 massacre in Hebron or the 1974 murder of children in Ma'alot. Also, none of the conscience-stricken intellectuals I know "admire a regime that keeps its victims behind barred wire and bloodhound packs." Is Mr. Kishon perhaps speaking of Rakhaf? But no one can accuse them of being either conscience-stricken or intellectuals.

While sympathizing with the PLO and admiring the oppressive Soviet regime, the conscience-stricken intellectual "hates" Gush Emunim. "These youngsters with their little skulls" (who are the last scrap of Zionism we have). He does not disagree with them, he does not disapprove of their actions — he hates them. And Mr. Kishon indignantly asks: "Even if he disagrees with their views, can a man of sound reason hate them?" Obviously the conscience-stricken intellectual is not of sound reason.

I recently read an article by the spiritual leader of Gush Emunim, Rabbi Kook, who made it quite clear that any decisions of the Knesset, the Cabinet, or of any other national or international bodies concerning Eretz Israel are irrelevant. What matters only is God's promise to Abraham as recorded in the Book of Genesis.

The conscience-stricken intellectual cannot argue with divine promises and commands, but he can and he does argue with politicians of religious and other persuasions who use Gush Emunim for purposes of all-too-secular, all-too-practical politics, as a lever in a power struggle with a weak Government, and who may drop those
